Nagoya University was the first Japanese university to establish a Joint Degree Program with an international university, between the Graduate School of Medicine and the University of Adelaide in Australia.

By implementing advanced educational programs currently used overseas and promoting research with international perspectives and high competitiveness with the objective of fostering talented researchers of the next generation, such efforts lead to the strengthening of Nagoya University's domestic and international presence and the assurance of the quality of education offered at Nagoya University.

We are currently examining the initiation of joint degree programs in other graduate schools, and will continue to move forward as a leader of international higher education.
